An October 1, 2013, Pew Research Center Report entitled, "A Portrait of Jewish Americans" details findings of a survey on the size, beliefs, practices and attitudes of the U.S. Jewish population. Included in the report are estimates of the American Jewish population using various definitions of who is a Jew; intermarriage and demographic characteristics; aspects of Jewish identity; religious beliefs and practices; attitudes toward and connection with Israel; and political views and social attitudes. The report concludes with the characteristics of people of Jewish background and Jewish affinity, including their answers to an open-ended question about the ways in which they consider themselves Jewish.

The Pew Research Center is a nonpartisan fact tank that informs the public about the issues, attitudes and trends shaping America and the world. It conducts public opinion polling, demographic research, media content analysis and other social science research. Pew Research does not take policy positions.
